Between 10:15 a.m. and noon on 2 January 1953, Aspern (P 49/X 49) airfield was occupied by 24 MiG-15s, 48 Pe-2s, 3 single-engine planes with radial engines and two-bladed propellers, and 2 biplanes. The entire field could not be observed because of the poor visibility.¹ There was a 10/10 overcast, light snowfall, and a northwesterly wind at 10 to 15 km/h. Visibility was good as far as the middle of the field and very poor toward the east. No air activity was observed. The five containers each holding about 15,000 liters were still observed at the western fuel dump. Eight additional containers, each of about 10,000 liters, were erected there. Four tank trucks were available in the dump.² Motor vehicles observed included 18 in the garages, a small van-like truck, similar to a delivery van in front of the garages, and 8 tank trucks, 2 radio trucks, 1 bus and near the flight control station.
